

THE SLIDE BACK TO WAR IN SUDAN

REBECCA TINSLEY

In January oil-rich South Sudan will probably vote to become Africa's newest independent nation. However, the military regime ruling what will become North Sudan is unlikely to accept separation without a fight. After years of appeasing Khartoum, what leverage does the international community have to prevent the slide back to war in this volatile region?

Rebecca Tinsley is a journalist and human rights activist who has worked in nine African countries. She is founder of Waging Peace, a London-based, non-governmental organization that campaigns against genocide and systematic human rights abuses, with a particular focus on Sudan, Chad and the Central African Republic. She is also a senior staff member of Network 4 Africa, a charity which helps to rebuild lives and communities destroyed by war and genocide, and is on the international council of Human Rights Watch.
